Mr. Speaker, I apologize for getting emotional, but I just feel so passionate about this.

With that, I yield back the balance of my time.

HONORING GENERAL JAMES MATTIS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the Speaker's announced policy of January 3, 2013, the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER) is recognized for the remainder of the hour as the designee of the majority leader.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-two minutes.

Mr. HUNTER. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

And this is probably appropriate coming after Mr. JONES speaking about the United States Marine Corps. I come before you today, Mr. Speaker, to talk about a great marine, a marine who was just in charge of Central Command and has retired and resigned after decades of service to this Nation, and let me start at the point where I was able to meet him.

Ten years ago today, the war in Iraq was under way. Nineteen days after the invasion, marines and soldiers had dismantled Saddam Hussein's regime. The takedown of Baghdad and Iraq was precise and supremely coordinated, much to the credit of Marine General James Mattis, who led the 1st Marine Division in Baghdad, and just recently completed his tour as the commander of Central Command.

On March 20, 2003, Mattis led the 1st Marine Division to the borders of Iraq. The marines' success and effectiveness, sustaining light casualties, was due to the intellect and the skill of one of the most cerebral warfighters of our lifetime, General Mattis. General Mattis is a tough man, exactly what you would expect from a United States Marine. He's practical in combat while laser-focused on securing the objective.

Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker. On the march to Baghdad, General Mattis landed C-130s on the highway to keep vehicles and tanks moving. Mattis' marines outsmarted and overpowered Saddam's forces. In the aftermath, Mattis took a totally different tactic. It was harder to win the peace in Iraq to a certain extent than it was to win the war, but that is when Mattis let his intelligence and his outside-of-the-box thinking show through. In the aftermath, General Mattis and his commanders, working to build trust, establish alliances, and support projects that were important to the Iraqi people, befriended what some thought were the worst people in Iraq in the Anbar province where the bloody battles of Fallujah and Ramadi roared.

General Mattis was able to make friends with those sheiks and with those elders and brought about the awakening where those local tribes realized that al Qaeda was their enemy and not the Americans, and they then turned on al Qaeda in Iraq and that was able to precipitate the surge and the drawdown from Iraq where we won, largely as a testament to General Mattis' leadership.

There were a lot of other great generals—General Odierno, General Petraeus, General McChrystal, General Kelly, General Dunford, who's now in Afghanistan in charge of the International Security Assistance Force, a lot of great generals. But General Mattis stands out to me, and I would like to relay a quick experience.

When I got to Iraq in 2003, I was driving north to join the 1st Marine Division, and we got ambushed. My marine that was on the Mark 19 in the gun turret got shot in the arm. And at that point as a lieutenant, we were taught to drive out of an ambush as quick as possible and link up and go back and prosecute the enemy if we were able to. We weren't able to at this point. It was 2003. There was no radio communication at this point in time. We couldn't talk with higher headquarters. So me being the highest ranking officer in this convoy, and I was brand new in Iraq and, frankly, didn't know much about anything, we continued north to where the 1st Marine Division was headquartered in a little place called Diwaniyah.

General Mattis happened to be in the command operations center when I got there and dressed me down for not prosecuting the enemy that had ambushed my convoy. He was angry not that a marine was shot or not that we had escaped; he was angry because we didn't get after the guy that got after us. That's a real trait of General Mattis. But for a lieutenant like me who had been in country for a few hours, it was a stark awakening to, hey, you're in the war, and you have to live up to the expectations and the presence and the example set by people like Jim Mattis.

I got to meet General Mattis again in 2004 when I returned to Iraq in the battle of Fallujah. We would call General Mattis "Chaos." That was his call sign because not only was he the cerebral and intellectual architect regarding a lot of what the Marine Corps did in the Anbar province, but he was also fearless. He would drive alone and unafraid by himself in his own light-armored vehicle, and he would show up anywhere he wanted to, day or night, in any kind of situation, whether there was a fire fight going on or not. And I tell you, he earned the respect, rightfully so, of every single marine and every single soldier who saw him on the front lines during those wars.

General Mattis is now CENTCOM commander. Through his leadership,

CENTCOM has overseen the Afghan war with a level of confidence and strategy that is indicative of General Mattis' touch. Aspiring leaders would be smart to take a lesson from General Mattis. He well served the United States Marine Corps and America for more than 40 years.

I would argue, Mr. Speaker, that this administration with this Commander in Chief likes military leaders who agree with it, military leaders that give this administration the answers that they like to get about the way that the world is today. And they are opposed, frankly, to military leaders who give their honest opinions, regardless of who is Commander in Chief.

General Mattis is the type of person that our military needs now more than ever before. And as he prepares to leave CENTCOM, for reasons that appear to possibly hinge on politics and this administration and General Mattis' take on Iran, I can say that I speak for the marines who have served under Mattis that a leader of his kind is near impossible to replace.

I would like to read a couple of quotes. This book is called "Victory in Iraq: How America Won."

□ 1720

The opening page, General Mattis is featured speaking to his Marines, the 1st Marine Division, in Iraq, or in Kuwait before the invasion. Here's what he said:

When I give you the word, we will cross the line into Iraq. For the mission's sake, our country's sake, and the sake of the men who carried the division's colors in past battles, who fought for life and never lost their nerve, carry out your mission and keep your honor clean. Demonstrate to the world that there is no better friend, no worse enemy than a United States Marine.

I would like to give General Mattis the appreciation of the entire United States House of Representatives and every single Marine, past, present and future, and every single American that owes, at least partly, the safety of this Nation to people like him and to him, literally and explicitly, for what he's done for this Nation.

Semper Fi, General Mattis. We hope that retirement treats you as well as your Marine Corps did.

I yield back the balance of my time.
